

Executive Summary

To cater to a changing world, we must analyze the intricacies of the generation that will shape the future of this world, and what comes of it. This project analyzes survey data from St. John's University students to help the New York Post better engage with GenZ. Through our analytical ability and background, we rigorously cleaned data, performed various analytical methods, developed models, and extensive visuals to capture the scope of GenZ's consumption habits. Through research and our own work, we were able to develop key inputs to implement for the New York Post to help engage Genz and boost overall performance metrics. Our insights are targeted recommendations for content strategy, platform positioning, and enhancements to both the overall scope of the New York Post's general mission, as well as the further development of the New York Post app and Project Hamilton.

This chart to the left presents itself with the GenZ issue. The amount of information sifting that is done in quick sessions is more than that of the other generations combined. Getting the New York Post to strategize around this can prove to be a differentiator.

Important Takeaways:

- Social media is the main driver in differentiating. 85% of users being on Instagram, and 88% of users predictively using social media, visuals, and short form content shows the key driver to holding GenZ market share.
- Don't make a young reader search, they get frustrated, bringing the news to them is the starkest difference we can make. In person through campus interaction, as well as timed notifications incentivize a GenZ reader, and make them included.
- Content has to be captivating stylistically but then the Post must make itself known fast. What that means is capturing the eye, and stimulating the brain, get to the point for GenZ, storytelling is drawn out, they can't focus.
- Don't forget about the majority while trying to gain the minority share in increasing the GenZ traffic. The New York Post has a following, make sure to continue to provide for them. Simply targeting GenZ can inevitably lose loyal users as they feel castaway.
